Contributions by Canadian Social Scientists to the Study of Soviet Ukraine During the Cold War

Abstract: This article surveys major publications concerning Ukraine by Canadian social scientists of the Cold War era. While the USSR existed, characterized by the uniformity of its political, economic, social, and cultural order, there was little incentive, apart from personal interest, for social scientists to specialize in their research on any of its component republics, including the Ukrainian SSR, and there was also no incentive to teach about them at universities. Hence there was a dearth of scholarly work on Soviet Ukraine from a social-scientific perspective. The exceptions, all but one of them émigrés—Jurij Borys, Bohdan Krawchenko, Bohdan R. Bocurkiw, Peter J. Potichnyj, Wsevolod Isajiw, and David Marples—were all the more notable. These authors, few as they were, laid the foundation for the study of post-1991 Ukraine, with major credit for disseminating their work going to the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies (CIUS) Press.

When Omeljan Pritsak, in a paper he delivered at Carleton University in January 1971, presented his tour d'horizon on the state of Ukrainian studies in the world, he barely mentioned Canada (139-52). Emphasizing the dearth of Ukrainian studies in Ukraine itself, his purpose was to draw attention to the inauguration of North America's first Chair of Ukrainian Studies, at Harvard University. Two years later, of course, the Harvard Ukrainian Research Institute was formed, with Pritsak as inaugural director. With its focus firmly on the humanities, his survey not only gave this country short shrift, but excluded the social sciences from its view altogether.

In fact, Pritsak's remarks were not at all a slight against the social sciences, because the latter's practitioners in Canada lacked conditions favourable to initiating, developing, and contributing to Ukrainian studies as such. Political scientists and economists, for example, offered courses and conducted research on the Soviet Union as a whole and on its command economy; however, uniform homogeneity was assumed to characterize the Soviet space, with little if any need or call for specialization in one republic's decision-making or distribution patterns. Sociologists studied "society" in general, unaffected by regional or local parameters, while anthropologists specialized in "undeveloped" or primitive societies. Scholars with an interest
