Cervantes, designated the father of the modern novel for his masterful narratology, reveals his modernity in the representation of his female characters as he constructs a new social role for women that allows them freedom of will and choice. Carolyn Nadeau looks to the women cited in Cervantes' prologue to Don Quixote, Part I, to establish a paradigm for the subsequent female characterization in the novel. While Cervantine criticism has offered sources for the creation of the female characters Dulcinea, Dorotea, Marcela, and Zoraida, no previous critic has sought models for these characters in Cervantes' own prologue. Nadeau postulates that Cervantes,
